Pasadena, CA — the Pasadena Museum of California Art is pleased to present three works by the artist Brody Albert. In the words of the artist, these sculptures incite the viewer to examine “the marks communities leave on their surroundings.” To Albert, our environments are not fixed, but vary based on human mishaps, chance, and purposeful intervention into marginalized spaces.

Albert's sculpture Orosi was gleaned from the fire escape of the now defunct Freemason Temple in Orosi, California. The damage done to the metal by over a decade of wear and tear is reimagined here by the artist as purposeful indentations that crushed the ladder into new configurations. This palimpsestic work now finds its most current home on the PMCA gallery wall.

These gestures of the urban rhythm continue with 110 at I-5, a life-size re-creation of the underpass of the California 110 freeway where it merges with Interstate 5. Pedestrians rub up against the wall of this underpass, the walls of which are covered in the sediment and residue from passing cars. Their bodies remove the build up in what Albert calls a "communally created abstract drawing." 110 at I-5 at PMCA is made using muralists' techniques: chalk, a pounce-bag, and a stencil. Albert's re-creation is not a simple replication, however. Albert's drawing is a negative of the original: what was initially removed, brushed aside, will be replaced on the gallery walls.

Wasp Nest (Mr. Horsepower) completes the triad of Albert's investigations into de-and-re-contextualized urban material. Certain species of wasps make nests through a process similar to paper pulping: they macerate debris and then regurgitate it into pliable and tacky material. The resultant pulp is then laid in thin layers, each wasp participating to construct one sheet on top of the other, forming a sort of collaboratively built strata around the sleeping wasp queen.

Albert's Wasp Nest translates this natural process and siphons it through a machine: pieces of standard Xerox paper are first cut into thousands of separate pieces and then glued back together. Like the wasps, the machine works non stop, running on a rigorous marathon for three weeks to complete the necessary form.

Albert's three works on view at the Pasadena Museum of California Art are reused and reimagined urban banalities, altered but still baring traces of their origins in the ignored spaces of a municipality.

Brody Albert is a Los Angeles-based artist working in sculpture and installation. His work addresses the objects that shape, and are shaped by, social interaction. In the last few years he has exhibited at CES Gallery, Arturo Bandini, WAAP, Garden LA, VACANCY and UCLA's New Wight Gallery and The Contemporary Art Center, Irvine. Forthcoming solo exhibitions include Access Gallery, Vancouver, Roger's Office, Los Angeles. He holds an MFA from University of California, Irvine and a BFA from Art Center College of Design
